ABSTRACT

Terrorism is a phenomenon of actuality nowadays, representing an important threat to national and international security. Corruption represents a scourge met in all states, differing only in terms of the development of the rightful state and of the level of economic development of the state. Corruption is higher in states in course of development, or poor ones. The terrorist groups take advantage of this phenomenon in order to gain influence and to apply their plans. Corruption and terrorism in the context of globalization, sometimes gains cross-border valences, and thus, the fight against them cannot be realized by the national states but by regional and sub regional systems. Starting from these theoretical and practical reasons existing in other societies, we consider that the period of transition that the Romanian society is still passing through is dealing with a strong recurrence of the corruption phenomenon. The present article makes a conceptual analysis of the notion of terrorism and corruption and emphasizes the bound between the two phenomena and the eventual implications upon national security.
