ABSTRACT

Globalization is an accentuated process with numerous effects upon all states. We can affirm that states depend on the situation from international level, for all their elements are interconnected. Thus, we deal with economic, politics and even socio cultural cross-border relationships. Once the transformation of these relationships took place, also the criminal activity took advantage of the positive effects of globalization, gaining in its turn, an accentuated cross-border character. The evolution of the process of globalization and that of criminal activities reflected also on national security. Globalization, both as a process and as a phenomenon, has a significant impact over the security policies adopted by one state or another.

The present article presents globalization in a conceptual approach, using also comparison with fragmentation. At the same time, it approaches also the main effects that globalization has on national security. In order to realize this article we used quantitative methods such as analyzing documents and comparative analysis of bibliographical sources.
